I. CONTEXT AND NATURE OF VISIT

A. Purpose of Visit

The comprehensive visit of March 4-6, 2013 resulted in a mandated Focused Visit to address two issues: assessment and governance. More specifically the purpose of the current Focused Visit is to address (a) assessment of student learning in general education and in undergraduate and graduate majors and (b) relationship and roles of faculty in shared institutional governance.

B. Accreditation Status

Accredited: the next Standard Pathways Year Four evaluation is scheduled to take place in February 2017.

B. Organizational Context

The University of Akron is a comprehensive, publically assisted metropolitan university in the Carnegie classification of “Research University, High Activity.” The institution has a current enrollment of approximately 27,000 students. The University offers degrees at the Associates, Bachelors, Doctors, Masters, and Certificate levels, totaling approximately 300 programs across a wide variety of disciplines within the Colleges of: Arts and Sciences; Business Administration; Education; Engineering; Health Professions; Polymer Science and Polymer Engineering, Applied Science and Technology; and the School of Law.

The University was founded in 1870 as the Buchtel College, becoming the Municipal University of Akron in 1913, and then the University of Akron in 1967. The institution has been regionally accredited since 1914 and is one of thirteen post-secondary public universities in Ohio.

II. AREA(S) OF FOCUS

A-1. Statement of Focus

In the report of the most recent comprehensive visit to the University of Akron (March 4-6, 2013), the team's response to Criterion Four recommended commission follow-up, noting that assessment of student outcomes is not evenly developed across academic departments and especially needs improvement in the area of general education. The team report specifically indicated that a Focused Visit in Spring 2015 was needed to "demonstrate that each graduate and undergraduate academic major and the general education program have assessment programs in place that include: 1) the skills and concepts to be mastered, 2) the assessment methods employed 3) the results of the assessment, and 4) how the assessment results are being used to improve each of the programs." The team report further noted that these concerns were identified in the 2003 report of a comprehensive visit and that concerns that had been identified during the 2003 visit remained valid in 2013.

B-1. Statements of Evidence

- Evidence that demonstrates adequate progress in the area of focus.

- Based on review of the Focused Visit Report and supporting evidence, along with discussions with faculty and administration, it is evident that the institution has given serious consideration to the recommendations of the previous site visit team. The Focused Visit team commends the institution on the significant amount of progress in the area of assessment of student learning that has occurred in the very short time interval of two years since the last comprehensive visit.

- Based on review of the Focused Visit Report, the institution has committed to improvement of assessment of student learning as a formal priority as evidenced by: support of academic leadership for assessment activities; communication to campus of the importance of assessment by the Provost; presentation to the Board of Trustees on progress of assessment activities; formation of necessary committees to support assessment efforts; and dedication of resources to assessment, including the hiring of a special assistant in the Office of Academic Affairs to provide leadership in the assessment of student learning in academic programs.

- Based on both a review of the Focused Visit Report and interactions with members of the Assessment Committee, the institution shows evidence that it has developed the necessary infrastructure to support assessment of student learning at the program level. This has included: development of a university assessment committee with members serving as liaisons to their respective colleges; creation of a university-wide assessment plan that guides the activities of the university; provision of templates to provide structure and clarify expectations to program faculty; provision of formal training to faculty and chairs, as well as faculty to faculty mentoring to assist in development of skills necessary for effective assessment activities; use of a common language to address assessment; and provision of feedback on program assessment plans. In addition, the institution took steps to make assessment activities manageable by focusing only on active programs and started with one college to develop effective assessment practices before broadening activities to other colleges.

- A sampling of program assessment reports by the Focused Visit team revealed that all programs have developed student learning outcomes and assessment measures, and many programs show evidence of using data to improve student learning. Review of program assessment reports indicates that programs show significant variation in the level of sophistication of assessment activities at this point, however. According to the assessment committee, the institution is now working to ensure that student learning outcomes are consistent across all course sections, standardizing coursework across full-time and part-time faculty. According to the Assessment Committee, the institution is also working toward integrating assessment of student learning into the curriculum proposal system in a meaningful way.

- The University is currently undergoing substantive revision of the general education curriculum. As a result, less progress has been made in actual assessment of the general education curriculum. However, the site visit team commends the institution for making assessment an integral component of initial discussions surrounding curriculum reform. Based on discussions with the General Education Committee, all outcomes need to be measurable and any department that puts forth a course to be included in the general education curriculum has to identify artefacts of student learning that address the relevant assessment component. In this manner, the institution is building the foundation for integration of assessment into the general education curriculum. The committee shows evidence of solid assessment practices, namely staging their outcomes and starting with the easiest first in order to learn from successes and challenges. In addition, there is a general plan to keep things manageable by looking at general education outcomes on a rotation basis, using random sampling to determine if learning outcomes are being met. What remains unclear from interaction with the General Education Committee is how this plan will be implemented on a practical level and how data will be used to improve student learning.

- Finally, the institution shows greater use of assessment data beyond student learning outcomes. Based on discussion with President’s Cabinet and review of key enrollment management documents, the institution is using data to inform decision-making at the institutional level. Within the area of enrollment management, there is greater intentionality is use of data and predictive analytics to inform decision-making.

- Evidence that demonstrates that further organizational attention is required in the area of focus.

- While the institution has made impressive progress since the 2013 site visit, the University is at a critical point in the continued success of its assessment efforts. The institution has demonstrated that it has the necessary knowledge and skills to be successful in the assessment and improvement of student learning and administration has shown support for these accomplishments to date. However, the level of continued resources devoted to assessment of student learning will play a significant role in how well the institution is able to build on current successes. The Focused Visit team is concerned that some of the structures that are key to the recent successes appear to be temporary in nature. These include committee structures and leadership being provided by the special assistant to the Office of Academic Affairs being a temporary, part-time position. The institution needs to develop an ongoing, sustainable approach to the assessment and improvement of student learning, that includes resources for permanent leadership.

- Based on conversations during the Focused Visit, it is apparent that members of the Assessment Committee are dedicated to the assessment and improvement of student learning and that some faculty members are beginning to appreciate the value of assessment activities. However, it was also apparent that much of the campus views assessment activities as burdensome rather than meaningful and there is a need for ongoing efforts to move the campus from a compliance mindset to a commitment to improvement of student learning. Based on the varying quality observed in program assessment plans, this will necessitate an ongoing training component for campus.

- While the substantive revision of general education clearly involves discussion of assessment as a central component, there is much work to be done to implement an ongoing assessment plan on a concrete level. The General Education Committee appears to be highly engaged with assessment, but there is currently no structure or process in place to move beyond development of assessment measures and artefacts. As with assessment efforts at the program level, resources need to be devoted to providing leadership and expertise to ensure successful collection and use of assessment data to inform improvement of the general education curriculum.

- Evidence that demonstrates that further organizational attention and Commission follow-up are required.

- None. The next Standard Pathway review (year four) is scheduled for 2017.

- Evidence is insufficient and demonstrates that Commission sanction is warranted.

- None.

A-2. Statement of Focus

In the report of the most recent comprehensive visit to the University of Akron (March 4-6, 2013), the team’s response to Criterion Five recommended commission follow-up, noting that because of the uncertainty of the final outcome of the current faculty governance structure, a focused visit in the spring of 2015 was recommended to assess the nature of the relationship and roles of faculty in shared institutional governance.

B-2. Statements of Evidence
• Evidence that demonstrates adequate progress in the area of focus.

• Based on review of the Focused Visit Report and supporting evidence, along with conversations with faculty, staff, and administration during the site visit, the institution has taken active steps to address concerns with shared governance. The report outlined several examples of faculty involvement in key initiatives since the 2013 site visit, including general education reform and decision to terminate or suspend admission to a substantial number of academic programs. While significant challenges remain, there is evidence of progress in this area.

• Overall, based on conversations with campus groups, several individuals noted perceived improvements in shared governance. Some faculty, particularly members of Faculty Senate, noted improvement in transparency and cooperation between faculty and administration. It is noted, however, that this view of improved cooperation and communication was not consistent across all individuals and that the Focused Visit team observed significant lingering sentiments of frustration with and distrust of senior administration.

• The appointment of a new President in 2014 has created an opportunity for changes in shared governance. During discussions with campus constituents, many individuals expressed a level of "cautious optimism" or at a minimum, a "wait and see" attitude regarding shared governance under President Scarborough. The President's book club was frequently noted as an avenue for having open dialogue around higher education issues and many individuals noted increased transparency around budget as a result of regularly scheduled meetings between the President and campus groups. Many individuals commented on the timing of the Focused Visit, with six months of a new presidency being insufficient time to gauge progress.

• The Focused Visit Report described three key structures that play a role in shared governance: Akron-AAUP Collective Bargaining Agreement; Faculty Senate; and University Council. Discussions with these key groups during the Focused Visit confirmed the role of these structures, although the Focused Visit team noted mixed perceptions of the effectiveness of these structures.

• Faculty Senate Executive Committee confirmed that the Faculty Senate is active and has a clearly defined role in academic matters.
They noted an increased willingness on the part of senior administration to have open discussions and consult up front on academic matters, whereas in the past their perception was a tendency for administration to announce decisions and then Faculty Senate would need to assert themselves. They also noted that elections to the Senate are now more competitive and described a more positive view of the Senate by the faculty body. There was considerable evidence of faculty involvement in major academic decisions, both presented in the Focused Visit Report and confirmed in conversations during the site visit.

- The AAUP Collective Bargaining Unit expressed concern over their current role in shared governance. Members stated that historically, their first negotiations with administration were very adversarial and that there was a tendency to file grievances as a method to get their needs met. However, members described their relationship with senior administration as “maturing,” noting that the current President is willing to listen to their concerns. Continued concerns center around perceptions of “top down” decision-making with insufficient communication by senior administration, a sentiment noted across meetings with several constituent groups. The Bargaining Unit expressed interest in improving relationships with administration, noting that the main theme for their upcoming negotiations is to improve lines of communication, including making contract language more explicit in order to better clarify the role of the Bargaining Unit in shared governance.

- University Council, totaling 130 members, provides an avenue for constituents across campus to participate in shared governance, especially in regard to non-academic issues outside the purview of Faculty Senate. The group noted that it is only within the past year that they have begun to work effectively and that the structure has allowed for increased opportunity to voice opinions and collaborate across campus, along with increased transparency. Members noted concrete results of the work of University Council, although they noted that their biggest challenge is legitimacy and support for their work, as by-laws have not been approved by the Board of Trustees. Several individuals across campus also noted confusion over the role and scope of University Council, including how this interfaces with Faculty Senate.

- Evidence that demonstrates that further organizational attention is required in the area of focus.
• Since its 2013 Comprehensive Evaluation visit, the University of Akron appears to have made progress toward addressing the team’s concerns within Criterion Five. However, observations during the Focused Visit are strikingly similar to observations made in 2013. Specifically, in the 2013 team report, it was noted that “there are several structures that promote shared governance including the Faculty Senate, the AAUP, the Collective Bargaining Agreement, and University Council. The administration uses all of these structures but conversations with a range of constituents revealed that there is still a strong sense of a need for additional improvements in consultation, transparency, and in particular, in explaining decisions.” The team also noted that “full implementation of the University Council (UC) could go a long way toward resolving concerns.” Among the concerns noted in the 2013 report were a lack of approved University Council by-laws and a “lack of resource support for (faculty and staff) participation on the UC,” and the call for “course-release time and for secretarial support.” Further, the report indicated that while progress had been made in addressing past concerns about shared governance, “there are concerns about how effective the processes that are in place are providing transparency and a sense of inclusiveness in the operation of the institution, particularly with respect to the operation of the University Council.” These statements are applicable to the recent site visit.

• The concerns stated in the 2013 report appear to persist in 2015. The University Council still does not have approved bylaws and the effectiveness of the University Council as an instrument for involving the faculty in shared governance was questioned by various groups during the Focused Visit. However, a different sentiment may exist; the shift mentioned by some faculty members toward a more optimistic attitude from the time of the 2013 Comprehensive Visit to that of the Focused Visit stems from the appointment of the new President. Having been in place for only six months prior to this visit, it was suggested that it is too early to tell whether or not his leadership would encourage substantive improvement in the relationships between the shared governance groups and the administration.

• Of note, the Trustees’ perception is that their role and influence does not extend to the institution’s challenges with shared governance. Being that University of Akron’s trustees are appointed through a political office (the Ohio Governor) rather than elected or chosen through University of Akron and/or the board, the Trustees’ orientation appears to concentrate more on matters peripheral to the university (i.e., relationships with donors and fundraising) than on issues that are integral to the University’s structure and operations (e.g., shared governance). It would be in the best interest of the University if the Trustees took a more informed role in its interaction with the institution, particularly in the area of shared governance. For instance, the University Council by-laws have been under consideration by the Board for an extensive period of time and there is urgent need for the Board to take action in order to ensure full functioning of this Council.

- Despite continued concerns outlined above, the institution appears to be acutely aware of challenges, with both administration and faculty expressing interest in working toward resolution. Drawing from conversations with the President and some faculty members, the team perceives that a culture shift is underway within the institution. Given that tension between the faculty and the administration had existed for some time, it may be that faculty complaints and reports of dissatisfaction reflect residual attitudes, i.e., those based in institutional memory rather than being representative of the evolving faculty-administration dynamic. With time and an adaptive, collaborative spirit from both the faculty and administration, the structures and processes that have been established will be given an opportunity to become fully operational toward enacting effective shared governance.

- Considering: a) the institution’s change in president, b) signs of movement toward a more cooperative climate, and c) the imminent 2017 Standard Pathway review, the team will refrain from recommending Commission follow-up in the interim in order to allow the University of Akron to direct its energy toward strengthening its shared governance practices.

Evidence that demonstrates that further organizational attention and Commission follow-up are required.

- None. The next Standard Pathway review (year four) is scheduled for 2017.

- Evidence is insufficient and demonstrates that Commission sanction is warranted.

- None.

CONSULTATION OF TEAM

A. Observations of Team Regarding Area(s) of Focus

- The current Focused Visit addresses two areas that represent a long-standing history of challenges for the University of Akron. In addition, the current Focused Visit addresses two areas that typically involve considerable periods of time to effect meaningful change, as both assessment of student learning and shared governance speak to the culture of an institution. The Focused Visit team recognizes that there has been a relatively short period since the 2013 comprehensive visit and is impressed with the level of assessment activity to address concerns of the previous site visit team. The Focused Visit team also acknowledges that it will take time for some of the activities that have been implemented in the areas of both assessment and shared governance to have a meaningful and lasting impact on the culture of the institution and therefore it is critical for the University to continue to focus its attention on both assessment and shared governance beyond meeting the requirements of this Focused Visit.

- Regarding the area of Assessment of Student Learning, the team offers the following observations:

  - The University has devoted considerable time and energy to addressing the concerns of the 2013 site visit team. All of the basics of an effective assessment plan have been put into action and this had resulted in a significant improvement in assessment of student learning. Key elements include support from administration, substantial faculty involvement, infrastructure (including identified leadership and expertise), and provision of clear expectations and training to meet expectation. At the program level, there are student learning outcomes and measures identified for each program and there are many examples of programs fulfilling the purpose of assessment to improve student learning. In terms of general education, assessment has been a central component of discussions around curriculum revision. This has positioned the institution well to engage in effective assessment activities rather than having to retro-fit an assessment component to an existing general education curriculum. The institution is commended for taking sufficient time to develop measurable outcomes in a planned manner, rather than rush to complete a general education assessment plan that is not meaningful and/or cannot be sustained over time. However, in order to realize the potential of the groundwork completed to date, there needs to be significant attention given to practical details of fully implementing the assessment concepts that have been developed in general education.

  - Currently, it appears that accreditation requirements are driving assessment activities. While the pairing of assessment and accreditation is sometimes necessary and can provide strong impetus for individuals to engage in assessment activities, there is a danger that the inherent value of assessment will be lost. The site visit team noted examples of assessment data starting to drive useful conversations around student learning, indicating the beginnings of a potential shift away from compliance mentality to a commitment to improvement of student learning.

- Regarding the area of Shared Governance, the team offers the following observations:

- The University has appropriate structures in place that allow for shared governance to occur. Namely, the Akron-AAUP Collective Bargaining Agreement, the Faculty Senate, and University Council provide avenues for campus constituents to contribute to governance of the institution. Of these structures, Faculty Senate currently appears to be operating most effectively. The strength of University Council is that it has created an opportunity for cross-campus discussion and collaboration. However, this body continues to operate without approved by-laws. In addition, while members of University Council provided examples to demonstrate effectiveness of the structure, the scope of the Council in terms of types of issues automatically brought before the Council, along with how it relates to other governance bodies such as Faculty Senate, needs further clarification.

- A critical element of progress consistently noted across many meetings during the site visit is increased transparency and communication around budgetary matters. This was stressed by the 2013 site visit team as being central to promoting successful shared governance. The current President has made a very deliberate effort to engage the campus in conversations around budget and these efforts have clearly been recognized by campus constituents.

- There has been a long-term history of adversarial relationships between faculty and administration at the institution. During the Focused Visit, the team noted willingness on the part of both administrators and faculty to work together, along with beginnings of a shift in attitude that will allow the existing governance structures to operate more effectively. It appears that the appointment of a new President has positively contributed to this shift and has created an opportunity for the institution to work towards overcoming past history by engaging in collaboration and cooperation on the part of both faculty and administration. However, the team noted continued concerns with trust towards upper administration, expressed across several campus meetings.

B. Consultations of Team

- Regarding the area of Assessment of Student Learning, the team offers the following recommendations:

- One of the most critical components to future success will be to establish a permanent infrastructure that sustains assessment efforts over the long-term. The institution has demonstrated success with the temporary committee structure and special assistant to the Office of Academic Affairs. However, similar infrastructure needs to be in place on a permanent basis. The site visit team strongly recommends that the institution create a permanent assessment position to provide leadership and expertise in the area of student assessment. In addition, the institution needs to continue to involve faculty in the assessment of student learning and the Focused Visit team recommends that the institution examine the critical elements of its committee structure that contributed to recent success and ensure these elements continue on a longer-term basis.

- The current assessment plan is based on numerous effective principles and has served the institution well over the past two years. However, the current plan frames assessment activities in terms of compliance with HLC requirements and explicitly identifies actions to be completed before HLC visits. The Focused Visit team recommends eliminating reference to HLC in the assessment plan. The institution needs to create an updated version of its assessment plan that retains many of the sound principles of assessment, but addresses assessment activities beyond the next HLC visit and from the perspective of what is in the best interest of the institution rather than what is needed to satisfy HLC requirements. Unless the institution begins to promote the value of assessment beyond meeting accreditation standards, there is a serious danger that assessment efforts will come to a halt after the 2017 HLC site visit given the intervening period between the subsequent visit will be six years.

- In promoting the value of assessment, conversations need to focus on improvement of student learning so that faculty see assessment efforts as meaningful to their work with students rather than simply as an added burden. This has already begun to happen with a limited number of faculty and will assist the institution in moving from a compliance mentality to a commitment to the assessment and improvement of student learning.

- The institution has engaged in numerous activities to provide training to faculty, chairs, and graduate assistants, including faculty to faculty mentoring, new faculty orientation, workshops, and a resource library. Ongoing training will need to be a component of the assessment plan. While continuing to offer workshops is of value, typically only a small number of faculty will self-select to attend such events. Therefore, the institution is encouraged to examine ways to impact greater numbers of faculty. In addition, given the increased reliance on adjunct faculty, training needs for this group must be considered. More importantly, any training efforts need to focus on use of assessment data to make a meaningful impact on program curricula.

- The University needs to build on the work of the General Education Committee and develop concrete details of how they will access and use identified artefacts from general education courses. At present, this plan has been developed at the conceptual level, but details are lacking. The plan needs to include a manageable way to collect data regarding the effectiveness of the general education curriculum. In addition, the institution needs to develop the infrastructure or capitalize on existing structures to be able to use these data in a meaningful way to inform improvement of general education.
- Finally, continued support from administration will be critical to ongoing success with assessment. This extends beyond provision of resources and includes continued communication from the Provost and college deans regarding the value of assessment. It appears that this has been a key component in success to date and ongoing communication from administration can assist in moving the institution from a compliance mindset to engagement in assessment activities that truly have the ability to advance the mission of the institution.

- Regarding the area of Shared Governance, the team offers the following recommendations:

  - In order for the University Council to have a legitimate role in shared governance, by-laws need to be formally approved and resource support provided for this group. In addition, the institution needs to determine the types of issues that will automatically be brought before this group and develop a mechanism for this to occur. It has been two years since the previous site visit team noted the need for full implementation of the University Council. Although the Council has begun to play a more active role in shared governance, this role cannot be fully realized until official by-laws are in place and the role of the Council and its relationship to other governance entities more clearly defined.

  - The AAUP Collective Bargaining Unit's goal of making communication a focus of upcoming negotiations is on target and has the potential to positively impact shared governance. Revisiting contract language to clarify areas of ambiguity will likely assist in more clearly defining the role of this group. Successful negotiations will require willingness to collaborate and cooperate on both the part of the faculty and administration.

  - Given the long history of challenges in shared governance and lingering impact of past adversarial relationships between faculty and administration, the institution might give serious consideration to engaging a neutral third party, external to the University, in order to capitalize on the opportunity presented with the new presidency and guide the institution in a more collaborative direction to build the future course for the University of Akron.
